

INSPIRING YOUNG MINDS: ORANG ASLI CHILDREN DISCOVER THE WORLD OF PRINTING

Imagine a world where books are a distant dream, and the path to education is fraught with challenges. This is the reality for many Orang Asli children in Malaysia. SEMOA, a non-profit organization, is dedicated to changing this narrative by providing education and support to these young minds.

Recently, we had the privilege of hosting a group of Orang Asli children from SEMOA for a behind-the-scenes tour of the book printing process. Their eyes widened with wonder as they watched towering machines transform blank paper into colourful pages.

"We hope this experience ignited a spark of curiosity and ambition in these young hearts," said Ms. Celine, who was one of the tour leaders. "It's truly inspiring to see their excitement and interest."

SEMOA, a non-profit organization founded by Cheah Kim Hock and Rajen Velu, is dedicated to uplifting the lives of Orang Asli children. Their center in Kg. Tras, Pahang, provides a home away from home for young students from the remote regions of Pahang, Selangor, and Negeri Sembilan, enabling them to attend school in Raub.

While the path to schooling is often hindered by geographical isolation and cultural barriers, SEMOA is committed to overcoming these obstacles.

Beyond providing shelter and support for students, SEMOA works tirelessly to improve the overall well-being of the Orang Asli community. Relying solely on donations, they offer essential medical care, nutritious food, clothing, and employment opportunities to villagers.
